Seven seconds of exhilaration

Seventeen years ago this year, Electric Works published a book to introduce Sheffield's first office-based Helter Skelter. Written by then-Director of Creative Space Management, Toby Hyam, the pop-it-in-your-pocket book, sets the scene for Sheffield's creative industries and makes the case for the role Electric Works would play in connecting, clustering and championing digital businesses in the city centre.

Written almost two decades ago, there is still plenty of inspiration in this book for people interested in workspace design and community building. On explaining why an office should deliver seven seconds of exhilaration (i.e. a Helter Skelter), it reads: "Workspaces for creative people should fuse experiences that challenge and stimulate the mind; that provide reflection and have the potential to result in new ideas and connection."

The first of four buildings on the Digital Media Campus, Electric Works opened in the very early days of the flexible working movement, when co-working, adaptable floor plates and less traditional interiors were fast-growing in popularity. Seventeen years later, and we are still attracting businesses looking for more modern, flexible space, a creative community to rub shoulders with, and of course - the city's only workspace to guarantee 'seven seconds of exhilaration'.
